OPINION

MR. JUSTICE McCAFFERY

DECIDED: November 21, 2013

We accepted review of this case to determine whether the Commonwealth Court erred in its interpretation of Section 306(b) of the Workers' Compensation Act ("Act"),¹ 77 P.S. § 512. Appellant, Annette Shoap, asserts that the Commonwealth Court erred by concluding that "substantial gainful employment exists" for purposes of granting a modification of her compensation benefits pursuant to Section 306(b), despite the fact that her application for the specific jobs involved failed to result in any offers of employment. Secondly, Appellant argues that the Commonwealth Court, even if correct in its interpretation of Section 306(b), erred by not remanding the case for further evidentiary development based on its interpretation of Section 306(b), which Appellant contends represented a change in the standard for evaluating cases under that statute. After careful review, we reverse and remand.

Appellant sustained a work-related injury in the nature of a left shoulder injury while working as an employee of Phoenixville Hospital (“Employer”). She began receiving temporary total disability benefits pursuant to a Notice of Compensation Payable dated September 25, 2003. The treatment for Appellant’s injury included three surgeries and physical therapy.

On August 9, 2007, Employer filed a modification petition alleging both that Appellant’s physical condition had improved and that work was generally available to her within her physical restrictions in the relevant geographical area, as demonstrated by two labor market surveys. Appellant denied the material allegations of Employer’s petition, and a hearing was held before a Workers’ Compensation Judge (“WCJ”).

At the hearing, Employer presented the testimony of Andrew Sattel, M.D., a board-certified orthopedic surgeon, who examined Appellant on May 9, 2007. Dr. Sattel opined that although Appellant has residual loss of function in her left shoulder, she was capable of performing sedentary work. Dr. Sattel also opined that Appellant was capable of performing the jobs described in the labor market surveys taken by Employer’s vocational expert witness, Jeffrey Kimmich.

Mr. Kimmich, a certified rehabilitation counselor and vocational case manager, testified that he had met with Appellant and conducted a vocational interview. He also testified that, in two labor market surveys,² he had identified five jobs within Appellant’s physical restrictions that were “open and available” in Appellant’s usual employment area, and had forwarded this information to Appellant. These jobs were: (1) telephone sales representative, at $9.00 per hour, available on May 23, 2007; (2) telephone sales/appointment setter, at $8.00 to $10.00 per hour, available on June 18, 2007; (3) hotel night auditor, at $11.00 per hour, available on June 18, 2007; (4) hotel front desk clerk, at $9.00 to $10.00 per hour, available on July 9, 2007; and (5) telephone customer representative, at $7.15 per hour, available on July 31, 2007. Mr. Kimmich then testified that he calculated Appellant’s earning power as corresponding to an average weekly wage of $347.41, based on an average of the wages of the five identified positions.

Appellant testified that in July 2007, she received Mr. Kimmich’s labor market survey as to the first three of the positions, and had applied for each of them on July 30, 2007, entering copies of her respective written applications into evidence.³ She further testified that she had never been contacted by any of these prospective employers, but also admitted on cross-examination that she had never inquired further about the positions after submitting her employment applications. Appellant additionally testified that in August 2007, she received Mr. Kimmich’s labor market survey as to the remaining two positions and had immediately applied for each of them. She testified that she had telephone interviews with both of these prospective employers, and testified, without objection, that she was informed by the latter employer that she was not qualified for the position.⁴ Appellant was not offered a position with either employer.

⁴ Appellant’s attempts to testify regarding what she had been told during the telephone interview with the first employer did not survive Employer’s hearsay objections.

Appellant further testified that although she had searched for other jobs advertised in the newspaper, the only jobs that she had applied for were the five identified by Mr. Kimmich. Finally, Appellant presented her own expert medical and vocational witnesses who testified that she was incapable of working at the positions Mr. Kimmich had identified in his labor market survey.

The WCJ issued a decision in which he credited the testimony of Dr. Sattel that Appellant was physically capable of performing any of the five jobs identified by Mr. Kimmich, further finding that Mr. Kimmich had indeed identified five jobs that were both compatible with Appellant's working restrictions and in the relevant geographical area. The WCJ rejected as less credible Appellant's expert medical and vocational witnesses. However, the WCJ also found credible Appellant's testimony that she had made a genuine effort to secure any one of the five of the jobs identified in the labor market survey, but had not received any offers of employment. The WCJ specifically determined that Appellant "has established that in good-faith [sic], she followed through on all of the jobs referred to her by Employer and that none of the referrals resulted in an offer of employment." WCJ Decision, dated 8/27/08, at 5, Conclusion of Law No. 3. For this reason, the WCJ determined that Employer had failed to establish its right to a modification of benefits under Section 306(b) of the Act and, accordingly, denied its modification petition.

On appeal to the Workers' Compensation Appeals Board ("WCAB"), Employer argued that, by concluding that Appellant had made a "good faith" but unsuccessful effort to secure any one of the five jobs listed in Employer's labor market survey, the WCJ had improperly incorporated into his legal analysis one of the requirements of Kachinski v. Workmen's Compensation Appeal Board (Vepco Const. Co.), 532 A.2d 374 (Pa. 1987). Employer asserted that the Kachinski requirements were no longer relevant in light of the subsequently enacted provisions of Section 306(b), which provide an approach toward a modification of benefits for claimants with partial disability differing from the approach laid out in Kachinski. In order to place Employer's argument, and the WCAB's and Commonwealth Court's respective dispositions of it, in proper perspective, some background is required.

Prior to 1996, the Act was relatively silent regarding the manner of approaching an employer's claim that it is entitled to a modification of disability benefits where the claimant has regained some functional abilities and is capable of returning to some measure of gainful employment. In our 1987 Kachinski decision, this Court established guidelines for evaluating such cases as follows:

1. The employer who seeks to modify a claimant's benefits on the basis that he has recovered some or all of his ability must first produce medical evidence of a change in condition.
2. The employer must then produce evidence of a referral (or referrals) to a then open job (or jobs), which fits in the occupational category for which the claimant has been given medical clearance, e.g., light work, sedentary work, etc.
3. The claimant must then demonstrate that he has in good faith followed through on the job referral(s).
4. If the referral fails to result in a job[,] then claimant's benefits should continue.

Id. at 380 (emphasis added).

Further, we observed that the above guidelines could create a viable system only when all parties, including employers by referring a serious, productive employment possibility, acted in "good faith," and, by so doing, created an environment where an injured employee could return to "productive employment." Id.

In 1996, the Act of June 24, 1996, P.L. 350 (“Act 57”) substantially amended Section 306(b) of the Act, renumbering it Section 306(b)(1) and adding Section 306(b)(2) and (3). Amended Section 306(b)(1) establishes that partial disability compensation benefits shall be based on the difference between the claimant’s pre-injury wage and her or his “earning power.” 77 P.S. § 512(1). Section 306(b)(2) defines “earning power” as “the work the employe is capable of performing and shall be based upon expert opinion evidence which includes job listings with agencies of the department, private job placement agencies, and advertisements in the usual employment area.” 77 P.S. § 512(2). Section 306(b)(2) also provides that partial disability “shall apply” if the claimant “is able to perform his previous work or can, considering [her or his] residual productive skill, education, age and work experience, engage in any other kind of substantial gainful employment which exists in the usual employment area” where the claimant lives in Pennsylvania. Id.

Because Section 306(b)(2) did not include the Kachinski requirement that an employer must prove that the claimant was referred to an appropriate “then open job” (except, as noted infra, when the employer itself has an appropriate open position), Employer argued before the WCAB that it was irrelevant that Appellant had shown “good faith” in applying for the five jobs listed in Mr. Kimmich’s labor market surveys. The WCAB, however, rejected this argument, opining that the WCJ’s decision did not, as Employer asserted, incorporate the Kachinski standards into the analysis, even though “good faith” pursuit of specific employment is one of the elements of Kachinski. Rather, the WCAB determined that “a fair reading” of the WCJ’s decision “shows that the WCJ used the words [‘]good faith[’] to show that [Appellant had] made a genuine effort to secure the positions located by [Employer’s] vocational expert.” WCAB Decision, dated 10/14/09, at 7 n.1.

Regarding the question of whether the WCJ's decision should otherwise be upheld pursuant to Section 306(b), the WCAB noted that the WCJ's decision was in conformity with South Hills Health System v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Kiefer), 806 A.2d 962 (Pa.Cmwlt. 2002), from which the WCAB quoted at length. More specifically, the WCAB observed that South Hills determined that the reference in Section 306(b) to jobs that "exist" must be interpreted to mean jobs that do not just "exist" but "exist" in reality and are open and available to a claimant." WCAB Decision at 5 (quoting South Hills, supra at 969). Thus, the WCAB concluded that modification of benefits could not be based simply on whether Employer had identified job listings within Appellant's physical requirements and geographic location, as Employer advocated, when Appellant had produced credible evidence that the jobs were in actuality not available to her, and thus did not "exist in reality." The WCAB held:

By taking the initiative and applying in good faith for the positions, [Appellant here] put the findings of the labor market survey to the test and demonstrated that the jobs listed therein were not, in reality, available to her. Hence, we conclude that the positions did not exist for [Appellant] and that the WCJ correctly denied [Employer's] Modification Petition.

Id. at 7.

On further appeal, the Commonwealth Court reversed. Phoenixville Hospital v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Shoap), 2 A.3d 689 (Pa.Cmwlt. 2010). The court noted that South Hills, among other things, opined that an employer could not satisfy its burden under Section 306(b) by simply providing proof of a working environment in the relevant geographic area involving positions that someone with the claimant's physical limitations could perform, but which were currently filled by other individuals. That is, an employer must do more than show that there are people in the relevant geographic area who are working at jobs within the claimant's physical and vocational restrictions. Rather, the employer must show the existence of "available" positions at the time its expert conducted the labor market survey in question.⁵ The court further observed, however, that South Hills did not address the issue raised by the present case: whether jobs are "available" to a claimant for purposes of Section 306(b) when the jobs are advertised, the claimant applies for all of the jobs identified in the employer's labor market survey, the claimant does not receive any offer of employment, and the employer's vocational expert is found credible regarding her or his testimony that the specific jobs were actually open, and thus available, at the time the survey was made. Phoenixville Hospital, supra at 696.

The Commonwealth Court determined that the critical question under Section 306(b) was not whether the claimant applied for and was offered a listed job; rather, the critical question was whether the jobs identified by the employer's vocational expert witness were actually open and available to anyone having the claimant's physical limitations and other qualifications at the time of the labor market survey. The court gave several reasons for this determination, namely, that (1) the employer could not be held accountable based on a claimant's possibly untimely application for the listed jobs; (2) such "open and available" jobs showed that similar positions existed or would likely open; and (3) the Act places a burden on the claimant to actively look for work once cleared for such activity, without regard to receipt of the employer's labor market survey.⁶ Id. at 697-98.

⁵ The Commonwealth Court also noted, however, that these principles were expressed as "dicta" and not as the foundational basis of South Hills, even though the Commonwealth Court here, like the WCAB, quoted such "dicta" from South Hills at length, with approval. Phoenixville Hospital, supra at 694-95. However, the Commonwealth Court also observed that these South Hills principles were adopted, or at least discussed, as substantive law in several subsequent Commonwealth Court decisions. Id. at 695 (citing, e.g., Edwards v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (MPW Indus. Serv., Inc.), 858 A.2d 648 (Pa.Cmwlt. 2004)).

In coming to this decision, the Commonwealth Court rejected any suggestion that Employer's labor market surveys were analogous to the job referrals described in Kachinski, which case, the Commonwealth Court opined, now presented an "antiquated standard." Id. at 697. Following this thread, the Commonwealth Court then stated that it was "of no relevance" that the WCJ had concluded that Appellant had "followed through" on Employer's job listings in "good faith." Id. The court held that because Employer had established that the jobs identified by Mr. Kimmich were open and available at the time he had conducted his earning power assessment of Appellant, Employer had satisfied its burden under Section 306(b), whereby the jobs listed provided the required approximation of Appellant's earning power. Id. Accordingly, the Commonwealth Court reversed the WCAB and ordered a modification of benefits based on Appellant's earning power of $347.41 per week, as calculated by Mr. Kimmich.

In reaching its determination, however, the Commonwealth Court also noted that it would not consider the final job identified by Mr. Kimmich (telephone customer representative, at $7.15 per hour, available on July 31, 2007) for the following reason:

[Appellant] presented definitive, un rebutted testimony that this position continued to be open and available when she pursued employment with this business. She interviewed over the phone and was not offered a job. Consistent with South Hills, [this] job ... "existed," but it was not "available" to [Appellant].

⁶ See 77 P.S. § 512(3)(ii) ("[T]he employe has an obligation to look for available employment.").

We accepted for review the following two issues:

- (a) Did the Commonwealth Court err and misinterpret the meaning of §306(b)(2) of the Workers' Compensation Act, 77 P.S. § 512(2)[,] in determining that a job is available to a claimant for purposes of said Act even when a claimant applies to each individual job contained in a labor market survey and does not receive an offer of employment?

- (b) Did the Commonwealth Court err in failing to remand the matter to the Workers' Compensation Judge for a determination of whether or not the jobs identified by the employer's vocational expert were open and available in light of the fact that the holding of the Commonwealth Court in the within matter altered the status of the law at the time of the decision rendered by the Workers' Compensation Judge?

Phoenixville Hospital v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Shoap), 18 A.3d 1093 (Pa. 2011) (per curiam).

Our standard of review of an agency decision is limited to determining whether there has been a constitutional violation, an error of law, or a violation of agency procedure, and whether necessary findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence. Section 704 of the Administrative Agency Law, 2 Pa.C.S. § 704; Pieper v. Ametek-Thermox Instruments Division, 584 A.2d 301, 303 (Pa. 1990). When, as here, the issue is the proper interpretation of a statute, it poses a question of law; thus, our standard of review is de novo, and the scope of our review is plenary. Borough of Heidelberg v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Selva), 928 A.2d 1006, 1009 (Pa. 2007). Further, “[o]ur basic premise in work[ers’] compensation matters is that the Work[ers’] Compensation Act is remedial in nature and intended to benefit the worker, and, therefore, the Act must be liberally construed to effectuate its humanitarian objectives.” Hannaberry HVAC v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Snyder, Jr.), 834 A.2d 524, 528 (Pa. 2003) (quoting Peterson v. Workmen's Compensation Appeal Board (PRN Nursing Agency), 597 A.2d 1116, 1120 (Pa. 1991)). “Accordingly, borderline interpretations of the Act are to be construed in the injured party's favor.” Id. (quoting Harper & Collins v. Workmen's Compensation Appeal Board (Brown), 672 A.2d 1319, 1321 (Pa. 1996)).

Appellant argues generally that amended Section 306(b) did not replace the Kachinski requirements or eliminate its role in evaluating partial disability cases, noting that this Court has not wholly abandoned the Kachinski principles.⁸ More specifically, she contends that the concept of jobs that “exist,” as provided for in Section 306(b)(2), is unclear; therefore, applying the Kachinski test leads to a reasonable clarity of the concept. Along these lines, Appellant relies upon the analysis set forth in South Hills, supra, to wit, that Section 306(b) must be read as contemplating jobs that “‘exist’ in reality and [that] are open and available to a claimant.” Id. at 969. In this view, Appellant asserts that an employer is required under Section 306(b) to make a referral to a claimant of jobs that would be “available” to that claimant. As further proof of her argument, Appellant asserts that it defies logic for administrative rules to require timely service of labor market surveys upon claimants if evidence of the fruits of applications for jobs listed in the survey may not be considered as substantive evidence. See 34 Pa.Code § 123.204(c) (“A vocational expert who authors additional written reports, including earning power assessments or labor market surveys, shall simultaneously serve copies of these written reports upon the employee and counsel, if known, when the expert provides the written reports upon the insurer or its counsel.”).

Additionally, Appellant argues that the Commonwealth Court’s interpretation of Section 306(b) places claimants in an unfair and unrealistic position in that they will be required to take the cost-prohibitive step of hiring vocational experts of their own to oppose the employer’s proof, rather than relying on evidence of their own good faith, but unsuccessful, efforts to obtain the employment that the employer has identified. Appellant asserts that this circumstance violates the precept that the Act is to be interpreted in a manner to achieve its humanitarian purposes. See Hannaberry, supra at 528. Finally, Appellant contends that had the legislature intended for Section 306(b) to replace the Kachinski test, or the concepts that are addressed by it, the legislature would have specifically indicated such in the legislation itself.⁹

Amicus curiae, the Pennsylvania Association for Justice (the “Association”), filed a brief in support of Appellant’s appeal. The Association argues that it is illogical to interpret Section 306(b)(2) in any manner other than that its concept of jobs that “exist” must mean gainful employment that is open and available to a claimant; otherwise, the statute's reference to "job listings" would be mere surplusage. Further, the Association contends that Appellant's evidence in this case that there was no offer of employment following her application for the jobs listed in the labor market surveys is simply a relevant and effective way to test the credibility of Employer's earning power assessment. Such evidence goes to the heart of the issue of whether jobs are open and available to a claimant, and a WCJ is capable of making the appropriate credibility determinations when presented with such evidence, as the WCJ did in the instant case.

⁹ Appellant secondarily argues that even if this Court affirms the interpretation of Section 306(b) made by the Commonwealth Court, the appropriate remedy would be to remand the case to the WCJ for further evidentiary hearings that incorporate the “new” Section 306(b) standard. Appellant contends that had the Commonwealth Court remanded the case, she would have considered bringing forward additional evidence regarding the actual availability of the jobs listed in Employer’s labor market surveys, including evidence from the potential employers themselves.

Employer argues that had the legislature not intended for Section 306(b)(2) to replace the Kachinski requirements, it would have so stated in the legislation, noting that until the amendment of Section 306(b) and the addition of Section 306(b)(2), Kachinski was the law of the Commonwealth. In support, Employer cites Riddle v. Workers' Compensation Appeal Board (Allegheny City Electric, Inc.), 981 A.2d 1288 (Pa. 2010), wherein we noted that "[b]y adopting [Section 306(b)(2)], the legislature lowered the Kachinski burden of proof by allowing an employer to obtain modification or suspension of benefits on evidence of earning power proved through expert testimony rather than by providing evidence that the claimant had obtained employment. ... In this sense, the legislature replaced this Court's Kachinski approach." Id. at 1293 n.8. Based on this view, Employer contends that any potential application of Kachinski to a Section 306(b) analysis, when the statute itself does not incorporate the Kachinski requirements, effectively results in a judicial repeal of the statute.¹⁰ Employer contends that with Kachinski removed from the analysis, it is clear that the Commonwealth Court correctly determined that Employer had established its right to a modification of benefits under the specific provisions of Section 306(b).

Our task is to interpret Section 306(b); thus, we are guided by the principles set forth in the Statutory Construction Act of 1972, 1 Pa.C.S. §§ 1501-1991. Accordingly, we begin with the precept that “[t]he object of all interpretation and construction of statutes is to ascertain and effectuate the intention of the General Assembly. Every statute shall be construed, if possible, to give effect to all its provisions.” 1 Pa.C.S. § 1921(a).

Generally, the best indication of legislative intent is the statute’s plain language. Malt Beverages Distributors Association v. Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board, 974 A.2d 1144, 1149 (Pa. 2009). We look to the language of the statute, which, if plain and clear, we simply apply; we may not disregard a statute’s plain language in order to pursue the statute’s spirit. 1 Pa.C.S. § 1921(b). However, our review also must take into account the precepts that the General Assembly does not intend a result that is absurd, impossible of execution, or unreasonable, and that the General Assembly intends the entire statute to be effective and certain. 1 Pa.C.S. § 1922(1), (2).

Where words of a statute are not explicit, but ambiguous,¹¹ a reviewing court engages in a statutory construction analysis that considers “among other matters:”

- (1) The occasion and necessity for the statute.
- (2) The circumstances under which it was enacted.
- (3) The mischief to be remedied.
- (4) The object to be attained.
- (5) The former law, if any, including other statutes upon the same or similar subjects.
- (6) The consequences of a particular interpretation.
- (7) The contemporaneous legislative history.

¹¹ Words of a statute are ambiguous when there are at least two reasonable interpretations of the text under review. Delaware County v. First Union Corp., 992 A.2d 112, 118 (Pa. 2010); Barasch v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 532 A.2d 325, 332 (Pa. 1987).

(8) Legislative and administrative interpretations of such statute.

1 Pa.C.S. § 1921(c).

As the arguments of the parties and the analysis of the Commonwealth Court make plain, Kachinski's shadow falls upon this case to some degree or another -- but it must be emphasized that Kachinski is not the initial or central focus of our inquiry. Fundamentally, our task is to interpret and apply a statute that makes no mention of Kachinski. The legislature did not explicitly abrogate Kachinski with its amendment of Section 306(b), nor did it state or explicitly suggest that Section 306(b) was to be interpreted in tandem with Kachinski. Because the present case was brought under Section 306(b), we look first to the provisions of that section and any other section of the Act that may be relevant for the proper disposition of the case. If the statutory language is plain, we apply its language to the factual scenario, which then may obviate any need to discuss Kachinski at all. If, however, the statutory language is ambiguous, then Kachinski, as an expression of existing law at the time of Section 306(b)'s enactment, would be one of several matters we might consider under 1 Pa.C.S. § 1921(c), albeit a potentially very important one. With this understanding, we now look to the relevant statutory provisions in detail.

We begin not with Section 306(b), but with Section 413 of the Act, which generally provides that a party seeking modification of benefits must demonstrate “that the disability of an injured employe has increased, decreased, recurred, or has temporarily or finally ceased.” 77 P.S. § 772. Pursuant to Section 413, when an employer seeks to modify a claimant's benefits by a reduction, suspension, or termination of such benefits, the employer must first come forward with medical evidence of a change in the claimant's physical condition that correspondingly establishes a change in the claimant's “disability.” See, e.g., Lewis v. Workers'

Compensation Appeal Board (Giles & Ransome, Inc.), 919 A.2d 922, 926 (Pa. 2007). “Disability” is understood under the Act as “the loss of earning power” caused by the work injury. Id.

Section 306(b) directly addresses the issue of partial disability and its correlation to earning power. Section 306(b)(1) provides, among other things, that compensation for partially disabled claimants shall be based generally on the difference between the claimant’s pre-injury wages and her or his post-injury “earning power.” Section 306(b)(2), containing the essence of the amended legislation, then discusses what the legislature means by “earning power,” as follows:

(2) “Earning power” shall be determined by the work the employe is capable of performing and shall be based upon expert opinion evidence which includes job listings with agencies of the department, private job placement agencies and advertisements in the usual employment area. Disability partial in character shall apply if the employe is able to perform his previous work or can, considering the employe's residual productive skill, education, age and work experience, engage in any other kind of substantial gainful employment which exists in the usual employment area in which the employe lives within this Commonwealth. If the employe does not live in this Commonwealth, then the usual employment area where the injury occurred shall apply. If the employer has a specific job vacancy the employe is capable of performing, the employer shall offer such job to the employe. In order to accurately assess the earning power of the employe, the insurer may require the employe to submit to an interview by a vocational expert who is selected by the insurer and who meets the minimum qualifications established by the [Department of Labor and Industry (“Department”)] through regulation. The vocational expert shall comply with the Code of Professional Ethics for Rehabilitation Counselors pertaining to the conduct of expert witnesses.

77 P.S. § 512(2) (emphases added).¹²

Breaking this section into its component parts, we observe that “earning power” is calculated from the “work the employe is capable of performing.” Id. Such calculation “shall be based upon expert opinion evidence,” which evidence “includes job listings with the agencies of the [Department], private job placement agencies[,] and advertisements in the usual employment area.” Id. Partial disability “shall apply” if the claimant is able to either (1) work his pre-injury job; or (2) “engage in any other kind of substantial gainful employment which exists” in the relevant geographic area and which takes into consideration several factors, namely, the claimant’s residual ability, education, age, and work experience. Id. (emphasis added). Section 306(b)(2) further

¹² Additionally, Section 306(b)(2.1) provides that if the employer (or, rather, its insurer) has a financial interest in connection with the vocational expert used by the employer to perform an earning power assessment, then this information must be disclosed to the claimant prior to the employer’s referral to this expert. Finally, Section 306(b)(3) provides:

(3) If the insurer receives medical evidence that the claimant is able to return to work in any capacity, then the insurer must provide prompt written notice, on a form prescribed by the department, to the claimant, which states all of the following:

- (i) The nature of the employe's physical condition or change of condition.
- (ii) That the employe has an obligation to look for available employment.
- (iii) That proof of available employment opportunities may jeopardize the employe's right to receipt of ongoing benefits.
- (iv) That the employe has the right to consult with an attorney in order to obtain evidence to challenge the insurer's contentions.

77 P.S. § 512(3) (emphases added).

places upon the employer the responsibility of offering the claimant a job if the employer has a vacancy that the claimant is capable of filling. Id.

We immediately recognize that Section 306(b) does not require that the claimant be offered a job in order to establish the claimant's earning power, except in the case where the employer itself has an appropriate opening. Earning power under Section 306(b) is unmistakably based on the employer's evidence of the claimant's ability to engage in existing "substantial gainful employment" within his or her physical, medical, and vocational restrictions or skills, not on whether he or she actually receives a job offer.¹³ Thus, an employer need not show that the claimant had obtained employment.

However, other aspects of the employer's burden under Section 306(b) are less clear, and are indeed ambiguous as the well-developed arguments of the parties establish, as this case places at the fore the question of what Section 306(b) intends by the phrase "substantial gainful employment that exists." Specifically, we must analyze whether this phrase supports the determination that an employer's proof is complete under Section 306(b) when the employer's expert witness proves that she or he has found one or more employment opportunities compatible with the claimant's established physical and vocational abilities from job listings with agencies of the department, private job placement agencies and advertisements in the usual employment area. This is the position taken by Employer in the instant case. Here, Employer contends that, because the WCJ accepted Employer's relevant proof over Appellant's conflicting evidence indicating that she was not physically capable of performing the jobs listed in Employer's labor market surveys, this circumstance effectively ends the matter, and accordingly, Employer prevails under Section 306(b), rendering irrelevant Appellant's testimony concerning her lack of success in her good faith efforts to obtain one of these jobs.

A more reasonable reading of Section 306(b), however, and one that comports with a commonsense reading of “substantial gainful employment that exists,” as well as the Act’s humanitarian purposes,¹⁴ is that the proof required to reduce or suspend a claimant’s benefits must rest upon the existence of meaningful employment opportunities, and not the simple identification of jobs found in want ads or employment listings. See 77 P.S. § 512(3)(iii) (“proof of available employment opportunities may jeopardize the employe’s right to receipt of ongoing benefits.”) (emphasis added).

An employer must prove a claimant’s earning capacity (absent an offer of employment with the employer) with evidence that potential employers are in search of an employee (as evidenced by, among other things, job listings, placement agencies, or advertisements) within the claimant’s physical, medical, and vocational restrictions. We agree, however, with the Commonwealth Court in South Hills, supra at 969, that the legislature’s choice of the words “job listings,” “placement agencies,” and “advertisements” to prove earning capacity evidences the legislature’s intent that the employer must prove the existence of open jobs that the claimant is capable of filling, not simply the existence of jobs that are already filled with individuals having the same physical, medical, and vocational restrictions as the claimant. The jobs identified by the employer’s expert witness that the claimant is “capable of performing” must thus be those jobs that are actually open and potentially available, not simply jobs that are already filled with existing employees. As the Commonwealth Court has observed:

¹⁴ See Hannaberry, supra at 528.

Although the General Assembly, in adopting Act 57, apparently intended to alter the burden placed previously upon employers seeking modification of benefits, this Court cannot agree ... that the amendment contemplates that employers may establish earning power through evidence of positions that do “exist” but which are unavailable to a claimant because someone else is working in those positions. Such a view would defeat the very purpose of the Act. By its listing of sources of positions (i.e., “agencies of the department, private job placement agencies and advertisements in the usual employment area,” 77 P.S. § 512(2)), it is evident that the General Assembly intended the concept of the term “existing” to mean positions that are available, because it is not likely that those sources would list positions that are not open and available. If the General Assembly had intended the term “existing” to mean job classifications and positions which “exist” in the workplace in the abstract, but are filled by other people in the workforce, it could easily have so stated. We therefore conclude that the General Assembly could not have intended an employer’s burden to be so limited. An injured employee is “disabled” because that employee cannot perform his or her pre[-]injury job, and that employee’s disability is not removed because someone else is working in a job that the claimant can perform, but cannot obtain because it is unavailable; succinctly stated, it does not “exist” for that employee.

South Hills, supra at 969-70 (emphasis added).

With respect to the Commonwealth Court’s observation that had the General Assembly “intended the term ‘existing’ to mean job classifications and positions which ‘exist’ in the workplace in the abstract, but are filled by other people in the workforce, it could easily have so stated,” we note that there did exist a prior – and clearly rejected -- version of the bill that ultimately became Act 57 that included a limitation on the employer’s proof to abstractions. The original bill proposed in the House of Representatives stated in relevant part:

(2) "Earning power" shall be determined irrespective of the actual availability of work the employe is capable of performing and shall be based upon expert opinion evidence. Disability partial in character shall apply if the employe is able to perform his previous work, or can, considering the employe's residual productive skill, education and work experience, engage in any other kind of substantial gainful employment which exists in the usual employment area in which the employe lives within this Commonwealth, regardless of whether a specific job vacancy exists for him or whether he would be hired if he applied for work. ... As used in this paragraph "substantial employment" means work activity that involves doing significant and productive physical or mental activities, regardless whether it is done on a part-time basis or whether the claimant does less, gets paid less, or has less responsibility, than when the claimant worked before. As used in this paragraph, "gainful employment" is any work activity that is done for pay or profit, whether or not a profit is realized.

See H.B. 22 16, Gen. Assem., 1995- 1996 Reg. Sess. (Pa. 1995) (emphases added).

Thus, we conclude that the version of Section 306(b) that was ultimately enacted, in contrast with the prior, rejected version, evidences the General Assembly's salutary intent that proof of substantial gainful employment must be based on the existence of meaningful opportunities for the claimant to obtain employment. It therefore follows that expert opinion evidence under Section 306(b) functions not only as a means of demonstrating that there are open jobs that exist within the claimant's limitations, but also as a mechanism for providing the claimant with notice of the existence of these jobs, which thus provides a serious opportunity to secure employment.¹⁵ Accordingly, a claimant must have latitude wider than that allowed by the Commonwealth Court here to present evidence regarding her or his experience with applying for the jobs identified by the employer's expert witness.

A claimant indisputably may show that the employer's labor market surveys were simply based on unsubstantiated, erroneous, conflicting, false, or misleading information,¹⁶ and evidence regarding the claimant's actual experience with the employers identified in the employer's labor market surveys may lend support for establishing contentions along these lines. Additionally, because an employer is required to establish the existence of substantial gainful employment that is compatible with the claimant's residual productive skills, education, age, and work experience, it would be directly relevant for a claimant to show that an employer rejected the claimant's job application precisely because the work is incompatible with the claimant's residual productive skills, education, age, or work experience.¹⁷

In addition, however, in order for the term "substantial gainful employment which exists" to be meaningful within the context of the goals of the Act, it must encompass more than the mere existence of jobs compatible with a claimant's restrictions that happen to be open at the time they are discovered by the employer's expert witness, as the Commonwealth Court held in this case. The statutory concept of "substantial gainful employment which exists" would be meaningless with respect to a claimant's actual medical and vocational circumstances unless the jobs identified by the employer's expert witness, which are used as the employer's proof of earning power under Section 306(b), remain open until such time as the claimant is afforded a reasonable opportunity to apply for them. Otherwise, the legislatively selected terms "earning power," "substantial gainful employment" and "exists," would become mockeries of their commonly understood meanings. See 1 Pa.C.S. § 1903(a) ("Words and phrases shall be construed according to ... their common and approved usage"). Among other things, the Commonwealth Court's holding could lead to the absurdity of an employer identifying one "open" job and using it to establish earning power for a number of "eligible" claimants, when clearly at most only one of these claimants could actually have the opportunity to achieve "substantial gainful employment" via this one opening. See 1 Pa.C.S. § 1922(1) (providing that statutes should be interpreted in a manner that presumes that the General Assembly did not intend an absurd result).

¹⁷ In the instant case, for example, the Commonwealth Court determined that an "existing" job was not "available" for purposes of Section 306(b) because Appellant established that she had applied and was interviewed for the job, but was told by the potential employer that she would not be hired. See Phoenixville Hospital, 2 A.3d at 697 n.12. The WCJ made no specific factual findings as to why Appellant was not hired for this position. We note parenthetically, however, that Appellant testified without objection that she had been informed during her telephone interview with the prospective employer that she was not qualified for the job because of her lack of familiarity with a certain computer program. See Notes of Testimony, 6/17/08, at 27-28. Arguably, Appellant presented evidence in this instance that the job was not within her vocational restrictions, even if it may have been within her physical or medical restrictions.

We are aware that Act 57 was intended to modify the evidentiary burden on the employer for cases involving partial disability,¹⁸ and we reject Appellant's argument that Kachinski, with its requirement that the claimant be referred to an open job and receive a job offer, should be used to re-interpret what Section 306(b)(2) requires an employer to prove. The statute's language does not track Kachinski, and quite plainly, Section 306(b) is not a codification of Kachinski. Significantly, Kachinski required the employer to refer a specific job to the claimant, which job, if obtained, or if rejected in bad faith by the claimant, established a basis for determining the amount of the claimant's partial disability benefits. By contrast, Section 306(b)(2) requires the employer to identify specific jobs. See Riddle, 981 A.2d at 1293 n.8 (emphasis added) ("By adopting [Section 306(b)(2)], the legislature lowered the Kachinski burden of proof by allowing an employer to obtain modification or suspension of benefits on evidence of earning power proved through expert testimony rather than by providing evidence that the claimant had obtained employment. ... In this sense, the legislature replaced this Court's Kachinski approach.").

With this understanding, we turn to the claimant's opportunity to submit evidence regarding her or his experience in pursuing the jobs identified by the employer's vocational expert witness, which evidence was substantially prohibited by the Commonwealth Court in the instant case. See 77 P.S. § 512(3)(iv) (a claimant "has the right to consult with an attorney in order to obtain evidence to challenge the insurer's contentions"). Evidence that the claimant pursued but failed to obtain gainful employment with the employers identified by the expert witness is undeniably relevant to rebut the employer's argument that the positions identified were proof of the potentiality of a claimant's substantial gainful employment. However, such evidence is, of course, not dispositive of the earning power inquiry. Moreover, a claimant must be afforded the opportunity to submit evidence that she or he did not obtain employment because the position identified by the employer's expert witness was already filled by the time the claimant had had a reasonable opportunity to apply for it. If the job is already filled, it does not "exist," to afford Section 306(b)'s language its commonly understood meaning.

The WCJ is charged with finding the facts necessary to support her or his decision that disposes of the motion to be decided. Whether a claimant had a “reasonable opportunity” to apply and did, in fact, apply for an identified position (and whether the job was already filled by the relevant time) are factual matters that the WCJ is fully qualified to determine.¹⁹ Moreover, Kachinski’s focus upon the requirement that both the employer and the claimant act in good faith in order for the intended system to function assuredly applies with equal force with respect to the parties’ duties and burdens under Section 306(b). Therefore, the WCJ in the instant matter, as the WCAB had observed, did not stray beyond the limits of Section 306(b) by making the relevant finding that Appellant had applied for the five positions identified in Mr. Kimmich’s labor market surveys in “good faith.”

However, we also observe that Appellant was not afforded the opportunity to fully develop her proof as described in this Opinion. Accordingly, we reverse the order of the Commonwealth Court and remand this case for disposition in a manner consistent with this Opinion.²⁰

¹⁹ We observe that it would only be the motivated claimant who would be able to offer admissible evidence regarding these matters. Not all claimants would actually pursue employment opportunities presented to them, as Appellant did here.
